There is hunger and need among many of us for environments of realness. For connection. For depth in the simple things that change who we are and how we are together.

So many of us seek ways to find more of what affirms life in ourselves and in our groups of affiliation — be they work teams, community committees, partnerships, or families.

This workshop is intended to help restore memory and practice for such realness, connection and depth — through an experience and exercise of circle and story.

Circle turns us to one another. It also turns us to parts of ourselves lesser known. Story creates sharedness, and universality from the personal. It creates breath and belonging.

I'll hold space for our connection and learning. I'll bring format and an exercise for circle and story, that you can carry with you to try in your places of learning.

I'll show up with my pedagogical excitement, and my passion for learning community. You show up with your open, curious learning, and desire to evolve your ways of facilitating and working well with groups.

About Tenneson

Let's here (www.tennesonwoolf.com) about my poetry, my coaching, and my facilitation practices learned over the last 25+ years. I'm a rather intuitive person when I'm at my best, creating ways to bring learning and insight to folks that want to do good work and be good humans doing that good work together.
