There are many of us that know the importance of a good question. The way it guides learning. The way it fosters curiosity. The way it invites innovation. The way it welcomes authenticity. And for the way that a good question enlivens a group's learning.

There are also many of us wishing our questions were more potent. That they were sometimes more purposefully playful. Or, more spontaneous. Or that they invited a more connected space together. There are many of us wishing to have a few goto skills for creating such questions regularly and with ease.

This workshop combines my long love of poetry (writing and reading) with my long love of asking questions (living mystery and clarifying essence). I offer it to encourage more people to bring resources of artistry to groups. And to see a patterned simplicity in using the smallest of poetic material to create the biggest of lasting insight and experience.

As before, I'll show up with my passion for learning and creating. You too, please. With wonder and desire to experience and evolve ways of working well with groups. Ah..., anticipation.

About Tenneson

Let's here (www.tennesonwoolf.com) about my poetry, my coaching, and my facilitation practices learned over 25+ years. I'm at a time of life when I'm attempting to share learning and practice as much as I can — the things under the things under the things. I'm an intuitive person when I'm at my best, creating ways to bring learning and insight to folks that want to do good work and be good humans doing that good work together.
